Comments to the Author (Required):

Why are there still so many citations from over 15 years ago? This can be ignored if it is related to the origin of the theory.

Also, there is a slight error regarding the writing of the citation from Sharma et al, in the second part (discussion related to Impulsive buying behavior, line 9 and 12).

Finally, the Author(s) must provide relevant research question.

Ulza E, Kuncoro EA, Furinto A and Mariani M

Please see end of this email for the abstract.

We emailed you a few days ago with an invitation to review this article for F1000Research, part of the Taylor & Francis Group. You have been recommended to review as an expert in this field, and we would be very grateful for your opinion (with a co-reviewer, e.g. a student or PostDoc in your lab, if you wish). Would you be available to review it?

Please let us know whether you are able to review this article using the following links: I accept the invitation or I decline the invitation. We will then send you details about the review process and a link to the report form that we will ask you to complete. We would hope to receive your report by 3 June, but if you need more time we would be happy to extend this.

If you have a potential competing interest please contact us before you begin writing your review, so that we can confirm you are eligible. We would welcome suggestions of alternative reviewers if you are not available to review this article.

As we explained in our previous email, we believe it is important to give reviewers full credit for their review, and so all peer review reports are published alongside the article under the reviewers' full names and affiliations. The reports are also assigned a DOI, making the work fully citeable and claimable on ORCID.

As a thank you, when your report is published you will receive 30 days complimentary access to peer reviewed content on Taylor and Francis Online.

We look forward to hearing from you soon - if you need any assistance please don't hesitate to get in touch, as we're always happy to help.

Best regards,
Rubiga

Article abstract

This brief article reports on the psychometric characteristics of the early development of individuals' intention to engage in philanthropic activities questionnaire. In the initial stage of development, the questionnaire was tried out by administering it online to a targeted sample. Out of 63 sample participants completing the questionnaire, only 43 data were appropriate for further analysis using the Rasch model. While the overall scale of the questionnaire suggested multidimensionality, subscales aligned with unidimensionality criteria. Acceptable reliability was observed in the overall scale and
